Wadneslay night at the brand new Normandy Park Clubhouse, with Mr. and Mrn J. B.C. Lucas as host and hostess Friends of Miss Francine Lucas and her cousts, Miss Adrienne Lucus, were the invited ones and no married persons nor any of the older set were present. If was, therefore, not the debut of Miss Adrienne, being merely an informal midsummer night dance, with plenty of fun, waltzes and two-steps from a Hungarian orchestra, and a supper that left nothing to be desired. Mr. and Mrs. Lucas always entertain on the most hospitable lines, and a big house party went over to "White Oaks" after the Lucus private car had whizzed out of sight of the ouse, conveying everybody else to Wellston junction. White Oaks is looking especially fine just now. Mr. Lucas takes great pride and a justifiable pride, too in his plants, shrubs and trees; and has had wonderful success in making European novelties, such as English oaks, Australian pines, Japanese plums and German lindens grow in Missouri roll. His vegetable garden, also, is a "show" one. and those two-pound ripe tomatoes, carefully upheld on the latest improved variety of wooden supports, the huge purple egg-plants, the vivid scarlet peppers, the sev-enteen different varieties of watermelons. now ready for the ice chest; the big green okra pods, and the juscious sweet corn, jair-ly make one's mouth water and afford one of the most interesting of country sights.

The peppers remind me of the story his friends tell of "Stony" von Phul, who went out to White Oaks not long ago, and on be-ing shown the garden, decided to est a red pepper, fresh from the vines, despite the re-monstrances of everybody within sight. He took one big bite, made a hasty Jash for the nearest water faucet and hadn't a word to say the rest of the day. A Lucas red pepper is fully as fiery as it looks.

Letters from the Douglass Cooks are willten from Munich, where they are stopping, after having done the Khin land and toured Switzerland thoroughly. From Munich Mr. and Mrs. Cook will start this week for a ing trip through the Bavarian and Austrian Highlands, some of the most beautiful and picturesque country of the Continent. They have been much interested in visiting the castles which the mad King Ludwig erected all over his domain, and sent sev eral friends pictures of Schloss Linderhof, which they particularly admire.

Miss Edna Brins, pleasantly remembered by many of the music and social sets of town, came down from her old home, St. Charles, a few days ago, and delighted her friends by a brief visit. She has been in New York working like a Trojan in vocal music, and studying with several different teachers for different things. Always a pretty girl, she has returned a ceally stunne woman, with an added ten or fifteen unds that is entirely becoming; and, with new poise that marks the fished and cula new poise that marks the fished and culture! person.

Miss Brins's voice is a full, rich dramatic soprano, which the late Charles Humphrey delighted to train, and which Eastern teachers have grown enthusiastic about. Her St. Charles and St. Louis friends will have an opportunity to hear her sing and note improvements on the 14th, when she, assisted by a handsome French-Canadian barytone, Francois Archmabault, are to sing in concert in St. Charles. A special car from town will take a large party to the 'cross-river village on the night in question.

"St. Louis is positively the worst place on earth—except the Sahara—to buy a between-season hat," declared a very tired-looking young woman, as I met her in the candy shop one hot moon last week. "I'm trying to get off to Manitou Saturday, and I want a knock-about hat that will not look like the last rose of summer, nor yet will it presage too much of autumn leaves. I have tramped the town over, and, except while the sallors, which grow in every shop window, I can find nothing that is at all suitable to the sallors which grow he across flat brims of monstrous width and depth, and sash ribbons trail down behind everything roade of felt, except the sallors. One novelty that made me look like a subject for St. Vincents's was a stiff white felt, up-St. Vincents's was a stiff white felt, up-turned all round the brim, and chopped off quarely in the back, with a plain band of black velvet for trimming. This was welrd in eed.

Another awfully and wonderfully flat article in gray felt had 'old' pink wings laid all over it. A third had a whole crown of the tiresome emerald green, with a white felt brim. For genuine freakiness every outing hat that I ever saw could not be excelled. But as I don't wish to shock any friends that I may have in Manitou I resolved to retrim an old rough brown straw that I had, and shall not invest in these latest novelties."

It inn't every woman who will tell a joke—good, bad or indifferent—on herself; but my West Morgan street friend has no companctions whatever in relating the following, and doesn't in the least mind that the lands are all on her, so to speak. It seems, not long ago, she decided to renovate a black taffeta gown in order that it might be taken to Atlantic City with her this month, and do some excellent service on the beard walk and eisewhere. She had worn the gown for two seasons, but while it looked a bit rusty, the silk was still perfectly whole and unworn.

Now, my friend is an indefatigable reader of ladies' magazines, takes three or four monthly, and says she gets no end of new ideas out of them. So, happening to have salted down some recipes from the periodicals which told how to renovate silks, she took her book—everything of the kind she keeps most methodically in notebooks—and soon found one that seemed feasible.

"Old silks may be made as good as new by dipping them in stale beer and pressing while damp with an iron that is not hot enough to scorch," was the way it read. Having entered the contents of several beer bottles into basin over night, she proceeded the next day to dip in the taffeta, which was an unlined shirt-waist suit and very easy to handle. Sure enough the results were everything that could be desired. The silk, pressed with the right kind of an iron, did indeed look well, and madame went off to Atlantic City with it in her trunk, proud of her new-old gown, and prouder of her conomy.

But, alas! Why is it that these recipes of her new-old gown, and prouder of her economy.

But, alas! Why is it that these recipes for making "old things as good as new" never warn one what must be avoided? Madame encountered several rainy days at Atlantic, and one day got that pretty taffora gown considerably dampened as she went from her hotel to another to pay some visits. She found her acquaintances in hewever, and they sat down to chat on one of the big piazzas. Hardly five minutes had passed before the St. Louis matron was nortified and embarrassed to notice that files in tens and twenties were swarming all over her gown, in her lap, on her back, cound her collar, and decorating the skirt like a pattern of passementeric. And every time she tried to brush them off, with an early of the same of the collar and the returned fourfold, while the none too delicate aroms of stale hear rose to her nostrils as her "renovated" taffets dried in the breeze. She cut her call short and burried home almost in tears, her hostess, who, of course, could not help noticing the files, wondering what on earth was the matter.

But little Mrs. West Morgan does not heswas the matter.

But little Mrs. West Morgan does not hesinate to tell this story, and holds herself as an awful warning to all credulous women who would fain "renovate" in like fashion.
